MINERAL

Mining in Parts of Utah is Reported as Not At All Profitable.

WASHINGTON, D. C., Sept. 19.—In June, 1911, a reconnaissance of the north end of the northern group of the La Sal Mountains, Utah, was made by James M. Hill, of the United States Geological Survey, for the purpose of ascertaining the extent and value of the ore deposits and the prospects for future development of the region. A report on this work has just been published by the Geological Survey as Bulletin 530-M, entitled "Notes on the Northern La Sal Mountains, Grand County, Utah."

The La Sal mountains are in the Colorado plateau region, which is characterized by mesas cut by canyons from 2,000 to 2,500 feet deep, with steep cliffs 500 and 600 feet high. Above this relative level plateau, which has a general elevation of 8,000 feet, the northern group of the mountains rises abruptly at Mount Waas to a height of 12,536 feet.

Two classes of mineral deposits are worked in the vicinity of Basin and Mesa. In the mountains there are several quartz mining prospects and at least one locality where placer gold has been recovered. The quartz mines have made practically no production, and it is probable that $5,000 would cover the entire output from both quartz and placer mining in the region.

The quartz prospects in the northern La Sal Mountains are few in number and the value of the ore is low even at the surface, where many gold-bearing deposits in other districts are enriched. The veins, so far as they could be seen by Mr. Hill, are small and contain much barren quartz. The high charges for transportation to the railroad at Glisco ranging from $12 to $15 for outbound and $25 a ton for inbound freight, are an additional handicap. The placers of Wilson Mesa are apparently of small extent. They contain only a small quantity of gravel, and all the gold in it can not be saved by sluicing, because some of it is carried in bowlders, which require some sort of crushing. They include so much material that surely carries nothing of value that it would hardly seem advisable to in-
